Unit-linked funds - how they work

Each unit linked fund is divided into a number of equal parts called 'units'. The contributions paid into a policy, less charges, are allocated to create new units and an amount equal to the value of those units is added to the fund. The income received on investments in the fund is reinvested to increase the value of the units. The value of the units also reflects changes in the capital value of the underlying investments. Depending on the fund, we value investments either daily or weekly and then calculate the unit prices. Whenever a payment is made from a policy, units are cancelled equal to the value being withdrawn from the fund. For more information, please see our guide to how we work out our unit prices on our website.

Prices and charges

Charges are made on your policy to meet our costs and allow us to make a profit. There are two unit prices. You buy units at the offer price. You sell units at the bid price. The difference between the two prices is an initial charge, known as the bid-offer spread. In some funds, there is no bid-offer spread and the bid and offer price are the same. There is normally an ongoing fund charge as well, usually called the annual management charge. For most funds, you can find out about this by following the 'more info' link next to the prices for the fund on our website. Other charges that may apply can be found in section 8 of our online guide to how we work out our unit prices.
